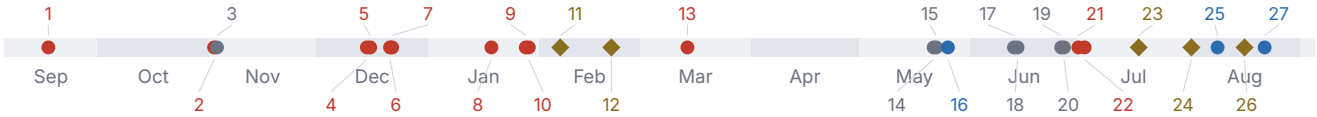
Your year at a glance

The exact passes of the year, calculated against your birth chart. Blue marks dates when much comes easily to you, red those where you need to look closely, grey two forces at the same point, the diamond an eclipse.



What each number stands for is listed from page 5 under “Month by month”.

The keynote of your year

This is not a year that moves in a straight line. From early September to early September, you will experience something closer to a tide than a journey: a long withdrawal in autumn and winter, months of pressure that ask you to question what you thought was settled, and then a summer that opens with a generosity that can feel almost startling after everything that came before. The year does not build toward a single peak. It shifts, contracts, and then suddenly releases. If you try to hold the shape of one phase while you are already inside the next, you will exhaust yourself. The more useful thing is to let each stretch be what it is.

Your Sun, Moon, and Venus all share the same sign, which means that when the sky presses on one of them, it tends to press on all three at once. Your sense of self, your emotional ground, and what you find beautiful or worth wanting are not neatly separated in you. They travel together. That is a gift in the warmer stretches of this year and a complication in the harder ones, because when something feels off, it tends to feel off everywhere at the same time. You are not imagining that. It is simply how you are built.

The year also carries a thread of slow, structural questioning that runs from late autumn all the way into January. It does not announce itself loudly. It works the way cold weather works: gradually, underneath everything else, until one morning you notice that your breath shows in the air and you cannot quite remember when that started.

September to December: The ground shifts under familiar things

The year begins, in astrological terms, on September 5, and it opens quietly. There is no dramatic event in the first ten days. If you are looking for a signal that something has changed, you may not find one immediately. But around September 16, something in your daily rhythm starts to grate. A role you have been playing, perhaps at work, perhaps in a relationship, perhaps simply in how you present yourself to the world, begins to feel like a coat that no longer fits. You are not in crisis. You are just slightly uncomfortable in a way you cannot fully explain. The friction is real but diffuse, like a conversation where nothing wrong is said but the tone is somehow off. This is a useful kind of discomfort if you let yourself sit with it rather than immediately rearranging the furniture.

October is relatively quiet in terms of direct pressure. If September left you with a question, October is when you carry it around without yet answering it. Some people find this restful. Others find the absence of clear events more unsettling than the events themselves. Either way, nothing is demanding an immediate response from you, and that is honest information rather than a problem to solve.

Then November arrives, and the texture of the year changes noticeably. Around November 1, something you believed in, perhaps a plan, a relationship's future shape, a story you told yourself about how things were going, begins to feel less solid than it did. This is not the sharp crack of something breaking. It is more like pressing your hand against a wall you assumed was load-bearing and feeling it give slightly. The disappointment is real. You may find yourself lying awake at 3 a.m. turning over a question you thought you had already answered. The weeks around this date are not the time to make large decisions, but they are an honest invitation to notice where you have been believing something partly because it was comforting rather than because it was true. Saturn is the planet at work here, and it does not soften its lessons to protect your feelings.

The very next day, November 2, brings a different quality entirely. Where the day before felt like something dissolving, this one feels like something being revealed. There is a heaviness to it, a sense of weight and consequence, but also a certain clarity. You might find yourself in a conversation that goes deeper than you expected, or you might simply feel more serious than usual, more aware of what actually matters to you underneath the surface preferences. It is not a comfortable day, but it is a real one.

December arrives with a cluster of pressure that is the most concentrated of the entire year. Around December 14 and 15, the opposition between the sky and your natal Sun and Moon hits simultaneously. You will feel this. Your sense of who you are and what you need emotionally will be pulling against something external, possibly another person, possibly a situation, possibly simply the demands of the season. The days around the winter solstice, specifically December 20 and 21, add a communicative sharpness to this: things said or written during this window carry more charge than usual. A text message sent on December 21 can land harder than intended. A conversation you have been avoiding may force itself into the open. The week between December 14 and 21 is the most compressed difficult passage of your entire year. It will pass, but it will not pass quietly.

January to March: The slow work of a long winter

January does not arrive as relief. The structural questioning that began in November returns around January 18 in a second pass, and this time it is less about surprise and more about endurance. You already know the question. Now you have to keep living inside it without a resolution. This is the unglamorous part of any real change: the stretch where the old thing has become impossible but the new thing has not yet taken shape. You may feel unusually tired during this period, not from overwork but from the effort of holding ambiguity.

Late January, specifically January 28, brings a different kind of difficulty. Something you want, or someone you care about, seems to be positioned directly against what you need at a core level. This is one of those days where you cannot quite make the two halves of yourself agree. You might find yourself saying yes to something while some quieter part of you is saying no, or vice versa. The dissonance is worth noticing rather than overriding.

February is the month of the eclipses, and eclipses work slowly even when they arrive on a specific date. The solar eclipse on February 6 falls first, and with it comes a sense of something closing or completing, a door that shuts not with a slam but with a soft, definitive click. You may not know immediately what has ended. Sometimes the eclipse reveals its meaning weeks later, when you look back and realize that something you were still holding onto in January is simply no longer present in your life in the same way. The lunar eclipse on February 20 is more emotionally immediate. Something surfaces that had been submerged. It may be a feeling, a memory, an old grievance, or a longing you had not fully admitted to yourself. The day around February 20 is not a day for suppressing what comes up, even if what comes up is inconvenient.

March brings one more round of friction, specifically around March 14, when the sky again pulls against your natal Sun in the same way it did back in September. You may notice a familiar feeling, as if you are revisiting the question that opened this year. But you are not in the same place you were in September. You have been through November and December and January. The question may look the same from the outside, but you are carrying it differently now. After March 14, the pressure begins to ease. The rest of March and most of April are relatively undemanding. The year is gathering itself.

April to June: Something opens

April and May are quieter than anything you have experienced since the year began. There are no hard passages in April, and this is worth saying plainly: you can breathe. If you have been running on tension since autumn, this is the stretch where your nervous system begins to remember what ordinary feels like.

Around May 22, something sharpens in the best sense. Your thinking becomes unusually clear and quick, even by your own standards, and you are someone whose mind already moves fast. You may find yourself in a conversation or a writing session or a meeting where the words come without effort, where you are saying exactly what you mean and being understood. It is a small thing in the calendar of a year, but it is the kind of day you remember afterward because it felt so effortless. May 26 extends this quality into something more structural: a sense that the effort you have put in since autumn is beginning to find its footing, that the ground is actually holding you rather than shifting beneath you. This is not euphoria. It is more like the quiet satisfaction of realizing you have crossed a threshold without noticing the exact moment you crossed it.

June is the warmest month of this entire year. On June 13 and 14, the sky aligns with your natal Moon and Sun in the most directly supportive way possible. You feel like yourself, perhaps more than you have in months. The quality of your attention is good. The people around you seem to respond to you more easily. June 26 and 27 add another layer: something in your relational life, in what you want and who you want it with, comes into focus. You might find yourself making a decision about a relationship or a creative project that felt impossible to make in January. The decision does not feel dramatic now. It feels obvious, which is usually the sign that it is right.

July to September: The year's last surge

July begins with some turbulence. Around July 1 and 3, there is an abrupt quality to the days, a sense of things moving faster than you planned, of being pushed before you are quite ready. Mars is the planet involved, and it does not wait. You might find yourself in a confrontation you did not initiate, or simply feeling irritable and restless in a way that has no clean object. The key is not to make the friction mean more than it does. After the warmth of June, this can feel like a step backward. It is not. It is simply July being July.

Between July 18 and August 17, three eclipses arrive in close succession: a lunar eclipse on July 18, a solar eclipse on August 2, and another lunar eclipse on August 17. This is an unusual concentration, and it will make this stretch feel compressed and significant even if the external events are modest. Things that were set in motion in February may reach a conclusion now. Something you began in June may already be showing its consequences. The eclipses do not cause events so much as they accelerate what was already in motion. If you have been honest with yourself this year, these weeks will feel like confirmation. If you have been avoiding something, they will surface it.

Around August 9, there is a moment of structural ease, a sense that something in the longer architecture of your life is settling into a more sustainable arrangement. It is not the loudest moment of the year, but it is one of the more durable ones. And on August 22, the year closes its active phase with a burst of direct, uncomplicated forward movement. You feel capable. You feel willing. The year has not been easy, but you are not where you were in September, and the distance between those two points is real.

Your areas of life

Love and closeness

Closeness this year moves in a long arc: pressure and distance in winter, warmth and ease in early summer. Around 28 January you may feel a pull between what you want from another person and what you need for yourself. Small things can turn sharp, and the tone between you can slip without anyone meaning it. Say less in those days and wait before deciding what a sulk or a silence means.

From mid-June things loosen. Around 26 June the Venus in you meets your own Moon and Sun, and closeness feels easier, more natural, with room for tenderness that needs no big gesture. Early autumn is quieter in this area, so you are not asked to prove anything in love at that time.

Work and money

The working year starts without much pushing from outside, and you set the pace. Around 1 November the weeks feel heavy and slightly foggy: tasks look less clear than they did, and you may doubt whether what you are building holds. Check agreements twice and write things down before they slip. A similar stretch returns around 18 January, as if the same question had to be answered once more. Around 26 May the picture steadies. Your efforts get a solid footing, and what you have carried for months starts to feel manageable. Handling your own money and obligations becomes plainer. You see what is truly yours to keep and what you can set down.

Energy and rest

Your drive follows the seasons here. Around 15 December you may feel pulled in two directions at once, and your inner rhythm clashes with what is expected of you. Rest then is not a luxury but the only way to stay steady, so protect your evenings. Around 1 July your impatience runs hot. You push harder than the day allows, and irritation comes quickly. Short breaks and slower mornings help you more than another burst of effort. By late August your energy flows more freely. Around 22 August you feel capable and willing, and what you start has momentum without a fight.

Your most important days

November 1 is the first date to mark. The weeks around it are when something you trusted begins to show its cracks, and your willingness to look at those cracks honestly will determine how much of the winter is spent in confusion versus in difficult but productive reckoning.

December 14 and 15 form a pair that functions as a single passage. These are the most concentrated days of friction in the entire year. Expect the week surrounding them to be demanding in ways that involve both your sense of self and your emotional life simultaneously.

February 6 and February 20 are the eclipse pair that marks the hinge of the year. The solar eclipse on February 6 closes something. The lunar eclipse on February 20 reveals something. Together they mark the turn from the year's contracting phase to its opening one.

May 22 is a day that deserves to be kept clear of administrative noise. Your mind will be at its sharpest, and the conversations you have on or immediately around this date are worth taking seriously.

June 13 and 14 are the peak of the year's warmth. These are the days when you are most fully aligned with your own nature, and what you begin or confirm in this window carries a particular kind of staying power.

August 2 is the solar eclipse that falls near the end of your year, and it is the one to watch most carefully as September approaches, because what it initiates will carry directly into the next chapter of your life, which begins on September 5.

Month by month

Each month with its precisely calculated dates. The numbers match the timeline at the front.

September · from 5 September

1	Wed 16.09.	Sun Square to your Sun

The month opens with some friction between who you are and what you are asked to be. You may feel restless with yourself, a little prickly, but it passes before autumn settles in.

October

A quiet stretch. After the unease of September, life runs at an even pace and nothing demands a decision. You can catch your breath here, before the heavier weeks of November arrive.

November

2	Sun 01.11.	Saturn Square to your Neptune
3	Mon 02.11.	Sun Conjunction to your Pluto

The mood turns dense. Things you thought settled feel uncertain, and one turning point asks for more than you expected. Take it slowly and let the fog thin before you commit.

December

4	Mon 14.12.	Sun Opposition to your Moon
5	Tue 15.12.	Sun Opposition to your Sun
6	Sun 20.12.	Mercury Opposition to your Moon
7	Mon 21.12.	Mercury Opposition to your Sun

A crowded month. Your needs and the wishes of others pull in different directions, and you may feel torn more than once. Conversations can sting. Keep your plans modest and your evenings free.

January

8	Mon 18.01.	Saturn Square to your Neptune
9	Thu 28.01.	Venus Opposition to your Moon
10	Thu 28.01.	Venus Opposition to your Sun

The old questions return, and a few relationships feel tense at the edges. You may snap or withdraw more than you like. It helps to remember that this mood is temporary.

February

11	Sat 06.02.	Solar eclipse
12	Sat 20.02.	Lunar eclipse

This month feels like a threshold. Something ends, something shifts, and it is hard to say which matters more. You may feel unsettled and strangely awake at the same time.

March

13	Sun 14.03.	Sun Square to your Sun

The tension of the last months loosens, though one day of friction reminds you that you are still adjusting. Life becomes more ordinary again, and that is a relief.

April

A calm stretch. After the upheavals of winter and early spring, nothing presses on you. It feels like a plateau where you can see how far you have come.

May

14	Sat 22.05.	Mercury Conjunction to your Moon
15	Sat 22.05.	Mercury Conjunction to your Sun
16	Wed 26.05.	Saturn Sextile to your Sun

Your thoughts and feelings finally speak the same language. You find the right words more easily, and a sense of steadiness returns to your daily routines and plans.

June

17	Sun 13.06.	Sun Conjunction to your Moon
18	Mon 14.06.	Sun Conjunction to your Sun
19	Sat 26.06.	Venus Conjunction to your Moon
20	Sun 27.06.	Venus Conjunction to your Sun

A warm, open month. You feel at home in yourself, and people around you respond to that. Affection comes more easily, and you may feel more like yourself than in a long time.

July

21	Thu 01.07.	Mars Square to your Moon
22	Sat 03.07.	Mars Square to your Sun
23	Sun 18.07.	Lunar eclipse

The ease cools quickly. Your patience runs short, and small obstacles irritate you more than they should. Then the month turns strange and charged, and a few things shift without warning.

August

24	Mon 02.08.	Solar eclipse
25	Mon 09.08.	Saturn Trine to your Uranus
26	Tue 17.08.	Lunar eclipse
27	Sun 22.08.	Mars Trine to your Sun

A month of change that ends well. Several things tip over, and you may feel pulled around. By the end, a steadier footing returns and you feel capable again.
